

TYPES OF INFORMATION IN THE FILES OF OSS

16 Nov 1977

1. The Office of Strategic Services (OSS) was established by a Military Order of June 13, 1942, as the principal successor to the Office of the Coordinator of Information. The OSS was placed under the jurisdiction of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and was assigned two basic functions:
  - (1) gathering, evaluating, and analyzing intelligence in support of the war against the Axis Powers; and (2) planning and executing operations in support of intelligence procurement. It also carried on military psychological warfare, including propaganda; incited and fostered resistance in enemy and enemy-occupied countries; and aided and directed open resistance groups in carrying out guerrilla warfare and in attacking selected targets. It was responsible for accomplishing sabotage in enemy and enemy-occupied countries, for organizing and supporting underground resistance movements, for conducting such operations as were not assigned to other Government agencies and not under direct control of a theater or area commander of the Army and Navy, and for equipping and training individuals and organizations required for their operations.
2. To accomplish the above-described missions the OSS was organized to include a Director, several Deputy Directors in charge of specific activities (such as Personnel, Services, Intelligence, and Operations) and their subordinate units in or near Washington and field establishments in the continental United States and overseas.
